

Mistakes in Censorship and Restoration

Curators are responsible for the integrity and context of artworks, however, these are not always done correctly.

When curators make mistakes, or come across mistakes, how do we fix them?

Issues in Restoration

GENITALS

OH GOD HERE THEY COME
BRACE YOURSELVES
SOUND THE ALARM
HIT THE DECK

Vatican vs Roman Statues

Should we restore the statues, or are the leaves now a part of the work?

Many would require new parts made, would this change the integrity of the work?

Is it different if the piece was broken accidentally (as the hand was on this image)

The Sistine Chapel

The Last Judgement, Michelangelo, fresco, 1536-1541

Portrait of Maria Salviati de Medici with Giulia de Medici

Pontorno: 1537

Restored under the assumption the child was Maria's son, Cosimo. May be the first portrait of a girl of African descent in European art.

Should the work be restored to look more like its subject, or should the first restoration remain?

'Ecce Homo' fresco - Elias Garcia Martinez

Cecilia Gimenez attempted to restore a 19th century fresco in the Spanish town of Borja, but failed. The damage is almost certainly irreversible.

Should there be an attempt to restore the work?

Was there a line crossed in either of these situations? Should the curators of these exhibitions have been more conscientious of the placement of these artworks?

The Holy Virgin Mary

'Helena' by Marco Evaristti

Displayed at the Trapholdt Art Museum in Denmark

Museum director was fined for animal cruelty for not unplugging the blenders. It was found not to be cruel.

Evarissti wasn't convicted, as he claimed he was disconnected from the act.

Now reinstalled, but with dead fish in jelly.

Should this work have been installed initially? Unplugged after the first act?

What should a gallery do when a piece of art puts employees or another form of life in danger? Would you have chosen to exhibit these pieces?
